Exploit international opportunities!

The last decades have seen a strong internationalisation of many aspects of society, particularly in the way we work.

This handbook 'Networking and developing international projects' provides guidelines and practical advice on how to build and maintain your own personal network and how to utilise this to develop international projects. The reader will also find advice on running a consortium as well as how to recognise and deal with the many barriers and critical success factors.

This book is aimed mainly at students and young professionals who are preparing to embark on a career in an increasingly internationalised environment. Hopefully, more experienced international networkers will also find useful advice and support. The author's experience was mainly gained in scientific research but this book looks beyond as well as at the science environment. Hence, much of the information contained here is relevant to a wide range of professions.

"To work in international projects is a challenging and stimulating experience", says Harry J. Blokhuis, the author of this book.

Harry is Professor of Ethology at the Swedish University of Agricultural Sciences and has successfully coordinated a number of international projects.
